Your wishes matter

Having a say in personal healthcare is vital to maintaining a strong sense of independence. However, there may come a time when, due to a medical condition or accident, you are not able to express your care and treatment wishes.

Advance Care Planning is your chance to make choices about your future healthcare and treatment.

What is Advance Care Planning?

By taking an interest in your health and considering probable future outcomes, you have already begun the process of Advance Care Planning. It's all about taking control of your future preferences, including:

- What treatments would you agree to or refuse? Under what circumstances?
- Would you accept life-supporting interventions? Under what conditions?

Discussions with family, friends and healthcare providers, and documenting your wishes are also encouraged. Some clients may also want to speak with legal professionals during the process.

How to get started

At Baycrest, Advance Care Planning (ACP) is an important part of your overall care plan. ACP discussions can be raised at any time as your care wishes evolve or change. Below are tips to help you prepare for your first ACP discussion with your Baycrest healthcare team.

Step 1: Think

- What is important to you in your future care and treatment options?

Step 2: Learn

- Talk to your physician and healthcare team to learn more about decisions you may be asked to make in the future.
- Know what substitute decision makers do and when it is appropriate to name them.

Step 3: Document

- Written care plans provide a very clear direction for your care team and substitute decision maker to follow.

Step 4: Communicate

- Talk about your care wishes with your healthcare team and designated substitute decision maker.
